of a married couple is of more importance than the other, the spouse will take up residence in the village of the partner who has the higher status. In any case, the kindred, as defined above, counts for more than the clan.

The recognized social unit is the lineage, its head is the eldest living male, hence it follows that the person to whom an individual looks as the one officially in authority over him is his mother's eldest living brother. Some lineage groups take precedence of the rest; their members are known as tsunaun, and the head of such a group is a person of great authority, though now possessing less than in the olden days.

For the reckoning of descent and succession the mother's side of the house is all-important, the father's side completely ignored, i.e. the community is in this respect exclusively matrilineal. But in the case of inheritance of personal property, either in goods or in knowledge, the society is both matrilineal and patrilineal, that is to say, a man can bequeath such property to his son or to his sister's son, or divide it between them, as he pleases.

Throughout the area there are two main clans, but others, smaller in numbers, though not considered as subdivisions, occur: the names and number of these small clans differ in different districts. With each clan is associated some creature, usually, but not always, a bird, but the association now amounts to little more than that of name, though it may once have been more important. The significance of the clan as a social unit seems to have declined considerably with the abolition of warfare.

Marriage is normally exogamous, but exceptions to this rule seem always to have occurred not infrequently. The important thing is to avoid persons with whom direct relationship can be traced either through the mother or through the father, marriages between cousins and the children of cousins being strongly taboo. (This applies to both parallel and cross-cousins.) The bride is preferably obtained from another village.

The relationship system is a 'classificatory' one, comparable with those found in other parts of Melanesia, with strong taboos regulating social intercourse between certain persons. The most important of these are their regulations applying to the wife's mother–daughter's husband relationship, and to that between the parents of husband and the parents of wife. These restrictions are lifted under certain circumstances.

On another occasion the same thing took place at Kurtatchi.

425 Some of the women went round to each hut breaking up water
579 coco-nuts, the owners giving them old ones for the purpose. The 565 reason was that the wife of one of the important men had called her husband a lazy good-for-nothing who spent all his time at dances and did no work. When a woman scolds her husband, if he is tsunaun, the other women go round breaking things from every house in the village, not only the house of the couple involved.

425 Intentional destruction of property also takes place on the occa-
882 sion of the wapi ceremony as described on p. 203.

INHERITANCE

565 A man's official heir is his eldest sister's eldest son. If she has 428 no son the second sister's son takes the position. Failing the sons of full sisters, a son of his mother's sister—for whom he uses the same kinship term—would be the heir. I did not meet with this contingency. It is of importance chiefly in the transmission of the position of tsunaun tʃan, the person of highest rank in the village. Pinari's eldest sister, Pari, had a son who died in childhood. The heir was, therefore, Kakari, the son of his younger sister Matev. He cannot alienate this right however much he may wish to do so. With it goes the right to direct certain ceremonies, and the official ownership of land. Wasɛ̄, Pinari's eldest son, held in Kurtatchi no official position, but was accorded a measure of respect by virtue of the importance of his father. But if he had been living in his mother's village he would there have been the person next but one in importance to the tsunaun tʃan, who was his mother's mother's brother, yielding only to the son of an elder sister of his mother. On the death of his mother's brother he had been sent to his father at Kurtatchi, and had elected to remain there.

428 Personal property, including ceremonial currency, can be, and 789 often is, left to a man's own children instead of to his sister's children. The same applies to knowledge of special magic. Pinari, who had no great liking for his nephew, had passed on his knowledge of magic for making dogs hunt well to his son Wasɛ̄, and did not intend to give it to his sister's son Kakari, who would succeed him as tsunaun. He said that Kakari would have half his material possessions, and his own children would have the other half; Kakari would divide it.

Other magic may be similarly inherited in several ways, either from a father—real or classificatory—or from a mother's brother, or from a brother. The magic for fishing with the ĕb which I obtained from Tchub, was given to him by his father Pasis and his elder brother Krapen, both of whom are dead. He was going to pass it on to Rarum, his mother's mother's sister's daughter's son, whom he calls kiar (brother). Ora, a rain-maker, was taught by Wawen his tsoa (mother's brother) just before he died. Ora had not decided to which of his relatives he would divulge the secret when he himself came to die. Some further instances of the inheritance of magic are given in Chapter XIII.
